[Positron emission tomography]. PET imaging is a nuclear imaging technique that uses the positron-emitting nuclide ^{18}F to image biological processes. The basic principle is the annihilation of a positron in the nucleus of a water molecule, which is bonded to a biological target, in the case of a receptor-targeted radioligand, or the energy liberated in the bond dissociation process is registered. Within a few seconds after injection, most of the positrons injected in the examined object reach the target, allowing a good target-background discrimination. PET is an extremely powerful tool for the characterization and the assessment of pathologies. In the last few years, PET has become available for the diagnosis of other pathologies such as inflammatory bowel disease, neuro-oncology, and infectious diseases. The purpose of this review is to outline the principles of PET, provide an outline of the applications of PET in different fields, and describe the equipment used for the procedure.
