India's Dawoodi Bohra Muslim community is one of the largest Islamic religious groups in the world. But in the latest allegations of child abuse within the sect, India's Supreme Court on Thursday ordered two independent investigations into claims that three people had been repeatedly raped by a former official of the community. The court's chief justice Deepak Mishra said no more than one independent investigation will be carried out by the government as that could prejudice the investigation. The Bohras, who live in Gujarat and Maharashtra, are followers of the Dawoodi Bohra sect, which is one of the largest Islamic religious groups in the world. The community says they are guided by the Quran, the biography of the Prophet Muhammad and traditional Islamic teachings. One of the allegations levelled against the Bohras relates to a nine-year-old girl. 'Not just a child' Amnesty International's India director Ritu Lahoti called the latest ruling as "a tragic day for children who have been violated and exploited in the Dawoodi Bohra community". "The Bohra community in India has a well-established track record of abusing and exploiting children. The testimonies that we've received paint a picture of a growing abuse within their community," she said. In a statement, the Mumbai Police said they had received information about abuse in the Bohra community. "We have forwarded the same to the Director General of Police who is investigating the matter and seeking additional information from the local authorities in the affected region," said the statement. The court said the two investigations will be carried out by two independent agencies, one in Mumbai and the other in Gujarat. The court ordered the two investigations to be completed within a month.
