The notice was issued in response to a complaint that an individual who had purchased a "Verizon Internet Service" contract had been able to access the provider's network without first obtaining the CSC's approval. The CSC indicated that this incident was the first such complaint received. The CSC determined that the individual had been able to access the provider's network because the terms of the contract with the content provider required that the individual purchase the content. The CSC also determined that the content provider had been using a test server to provide the content in question, which had not been approved for access to the network. Therefore, the CSC imposed a five-year cardholder screening requirement on the content provider to prevent similar occurrences from recurring. Affected parties are encouraged to check their contract(s) with content providers to determine if a cardholder screening requirement is specified. To facilitate this process, the CSC is offering credit card issuer contract terms pertaining to Internet access. Cardholders should be aware that credit card companies generally allow cardholders to make use of any Internet-enabled devices, such as DSL routers and set-top boxes. The credit card companies make certain that cardholders are aware of these Internet-enabled devices prior to the issuance of the card. However, the card issuer will not necessarily require the cardholder to obtain permission before accessing these Internet-enabled devices, provided that the cardholder has not been notified by the credit card company of a requirement to obtain permission prior to access. Credit card companies generally have in place an easy and effective process for the consumer to obtain authorization for the use of Internet-enabled devices. Therefore, credit card companies generally do not impose cardholder screening requirements in situations where the credit card company is not aware of an existing requirement to obtain authorization prior to the use of Internet-enabled devices. While the CSC is aware of the many uses to which Internet-enabled devices may be put, it is the CSC's responsibility to ensure that cardholders are aware
