What's New In?

- Speed counter shows you which part of the internet connection is doing most of the work. - The closer to "0" the faster the internet connection. - Instant update. - You have to be connected to the internet for it to count and display the internet connection speed. - Supports Firefox, Chrome and Internet Explorer. - Audio can be turned off, and I will consider adding a setting to disable the audio. It works perfectly when doing things like a download, uploading to facebook etc. The issue is that I'm also streaming media from my server so I have to have it count while it's streaming. I'm considering the following options: - Counting while streaming or downloading - Counting when I'm not actively streaming. Probably when I'm not using the internet - If you think of a better solution, please let me know. It would be perfect if you could contribute. I appreciate any suggestions, thanks. If you have any problems with the script please let me know. ======= Have a look at the picture. They are (2) little diodes with wires (yellow) running back to the IC. The diodes are used to count down the potential difference between the two ICs. The reason for running the wires back to the ICs is to eliminate any extra noise during the count. The obvious advantage of this over just counting the potential difference between the ICs is that we are counting while the signal is flowing. We are only interested in measuring the current, the resistance is another story. Here are some more pics of the diodes. 1.) 2.) 3.) The anode and cathode of the diode are attached to the -ve and +ve sides of the IC. The diodes have a small potential difference depending on if the diode is on or off. If it is an on diode the potential difference is ~0.3V. If it is an off diode the potential difference is ~10V. On of the diodes is connected to the +ve side of the IC and the other diode is connected to the -ve
