Sepioteuthis lessoniana is a large, gliding squid from the northeast Atlantic. Despite its cosmopolitan distribution, little is known of its biology and biochemistry, and no information is available on the bioactive compounds produced by Sepioteuthis. In the present study, Sepioteuthis was collected from the lower Atlantic Ocean from July to October 1995, and used for screening of bioactive protein fractions by a panel of in vitro assays. Multiple bioactive fractions were recovered, the majority of which displayed antibacterial activity against bacteria isolated from Sepioteuthis, and many of which also exhibited cytotoxicity towards mammalian cell lines. The protein fractions were characterized by analytical and electrophoretic methods. Sodium dodecyl sulfate-polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis (SDS-PAGE) of the active fractions revealed patterns with molecular masses ranging from a few kDa to more than 400 kDa. However, high-resolution electrophoresis of the active bands in an activated polyacrylamide gel indicated that the molecular mass of the active bands was in the range of 50-90 kDa.
