It's become fashionable for the press to become fans of the New York Jets. Well I think this is an over-reaction, but I'd like to offer up this theory of the motivations at work in so many of the recent articles I've read. I think the real motivation is envy. Envy of the NFL's highest-profile franchise, no less! I read a few over-the-top articles about the team this morning. The most striking to me, and the one that really hit home, was the one called "Why New York Jets Fans Keep Waiting for the Money to Come" in the New York Daily News. I understand we're all human, but is there truly any "fan" on the planet that would be excited about dealing with a team that just found out it was a playoff contender, having just watched them lose their starting QB, and just fired the last coach the team had... the one who they spent all their time and money on until they fired him and hired his buddy? If that's not the parent's worst nightmare, I don't know what is. The New York Daily News writer was over the top but he hit something home to me. Maybe its the Jets' noble nature, I don't know. But it seems they have all along played up the drama that would result if they ever made the playoffs (which is what the writer missed). And that has been a huge part of it, the "drama," the story of the Jets season, including the trade deadline, the firing of Woody, the firing of Mangini,

That is, we have an ability to be conscious of our own experience, our own brains, our own minds, our own thoughts, our own emotions. Likewise, we are conscious of other living things, like dogs, cats, trees, clouds, and rocks. Therefore, it follows that if we are conscious of anything, then it can think about us. If we are not conscious of anything, then by the same argument, it cannot think about us. Is this reasoning valid? A: This all depends on how you define consciousness. For our purposes let's define it as "experience awareness". Therefore, I would say that whether we are conscious of other living things or not, it has no effect on whether or not it is conscious of us. The reason for this is that we can't really say what it is to be "conscious" of something, we can only imply our perception of what it is to be conscious of something. We have rudimentary knowledge that allows us to exist. We are born into the world with only the barest of means to understand our existence. But as we grow we gain experience. This is consciousness. To be conscious of anything would be to be aware of having this experience, whether it has an external or internal basis. When we look at a tree, we experience the tree as a thing. It is aware of being a thing. It is neither an entity nor an energy, but a physical object. We experience ourselves as living things, and we are aware that we are 09e8f5149f
