This release includes many new features, fixes, enhancements, and enhancements. Features new to this release include . aermod modeler test Model Development and Testing - Subsystems and Tools Aerodynamic Surface Calculation: "The Aerodynamic Surface (AS) subsystem computes the structure of the turbulent boundary layer over the surface. . The AS interface consists of the following: . The source code for the AS subsystem can be built with either FORTRAN or C. The library interface is built with FORTRAN. . An interface subroutine provides the interface to the AS module, including a capability to change the selection of turbulence model. . Computations consist of three stages (see Figure A2.1-1): . The first stage estimates turbulent velocities and their gradients. . The second stage estimates the area-weighted average wall concentration. . The third stage calculates the distribution of turbulent kinetic energy over the surface. . The turbulent behavior of the surface layer is examined in order to estimate the areas that may be suitable for film formation and the areas that may not be. . The AS interface subroutine is a typical FORTRAN subroutine that provides the interface between the AS module and the numerical procedures. . The interface subroutine is provided as a stand-alone code which can be used by the non-modeling user to compute the surface turbulence model." . An interface to a subroutine library permits numerical processing to be separated from the AS module. . " The interface subroutine controls the selection of turbulence model, temperature and pollutant source scenarios, and internal settings of the turbulence model. . Weather Input and Output: "The Weather Input module (WIM) provides a mechanism to input data from the specified external weather files. . The WIM reads the specified data from the various files and makes it available to the Aerodynamic Surface module. . The WIM may also generate its own data in response to changes in the model parameters and associated parameters, and provide the information to the AS module. . The Weather Output
