I just enabled the Git reflog, and I find that I have to scroll through 4 gazillion lines of reflog messages. Surely, there must be a way to get rid of the "repository" message? I do realize that the "repository" message is used to communicate the commits to other parties. But surely the reflog messages are simply for my personal use, right? A: Yes, and it's easy to find out how. Run this command in a shell (shell is assumed unless you provide otherwise), when you're in the repository root: git reflog expire This will make Git forget about all commits for seven days. Note: you may be thinking that running this command will "make all the commits disappear forever", and that's not true. As long as you're willing to run it once every seven days, the commits will remain reachable; and if you use one of Git's supported commands to delete refs/heads/master, then the commits will remain reachable, but you may find it a little odd if you do that in a similar way every seven days. A: Reflog will show all commits based on the branch. For example, if you have some commits in the master branch, and you pull another commit from that branch: git reflog master You should see output similar to this: Note that the timestamp is the 3da54e8ca3
