Example table (p and c are both INT): result table should be: A: You can use a query that calculates the average based on the number of rows. SELECT AVG(price) FROM prices WHERE c=1; This will return the average of all the prices that are for the category 1 WHERE c=1 implies that all the rows that are returned for this query should have the same category column =1 basically means that the category of all the rows returned for this query should be 1. In your case where your data is shown in the sample, the query returns the average of all the prices that have the category of 1. Q
