The domestic mortgage crisis, along with the recent financial crises, have discredited large banks and emphasized the importance of keeping costs down and prudently managing risk. This thesis will show that this is only half the story. It will examine how large financial institutions manage risk when not under the regulatory control of the government. This research uses the example of five subprime mortgage deals involving Deutsche Bank. First, this research will examine the key organizational and management features of large financial institutions and their approaches to risk. Second, the thesis will examine how large financial institutions would deal with a series of crises that would occur if the government withdrew its regulatory control. This research also examines the different outcomes of managing risk in these different types of institutions. Finally, this research will try to identify how different ways of managing risk by banks affect their ability to provide financial services in a market economy. The study of Social Studies was not my favorite subject. I was much more interested in science. As a result, I had no intention to take the Social Studies course in the first semester of my freshman year in high school. This changed when I took a social studies course in my sophomore year. It was called "Civilization in America". The course enabled me to see what social studies was all about. In this course, we took a field trip to Fife, Washington, where we visited a school called Fife-Wallingford. I loved the school and its principle, John Dye. It was the first time that I was intrigued by the social studies and took it seriously. I was hooked. I signed up for a course in "Social Studies for High School Students" during my junior year, and I ended up taking three semesters of it. I now knew what I was doing and made sure that I took more social studies courses at college. My thirst for knowledge was sparked. Unlike most of my friends, I am not a lucky person. I do not enjoy having a lot of money. Instead, I enjoy making money. I enjoy making my friends happy with money. I enjoy taking my friends to nice restaurants and everything that I could do with my money. But even so, I do not like to spend so much of my money that I will not have anything left to spend it on. We live in a society that has made spending money easy. In addition, it is important to know how to manage money. The scientific method has been the fundamental basis of all philosophy and the tools that are used to obtain knowledge. The scientific method
