" Tags: multi-platform, podcast, downloadPhilosophy of Girls Philosophy of Girls is the third studio album by the English ska punk band the Specials. It was released in 1985, and is their last album with the band's original lineup of Terry Hall, Lynval

Golding, Lynval Golding Jr., Denise Austin and Horace Panter. It also marks the group's first release on Columbia Records. The album shares similarities with the group's earlier work, particularly the themes and political content of its lyrics. Though some songs are more polished than those on their previous album, Differences, others still contain rough mixes, and the album itself was recorded in a hurry. The album would later be remastered and re-released in 2018 as part of the band's 40th anniversary box set. Background After having disbanded in 1982, the Specials had become a pivotal part of the ska scene in London. When asked, Hall explained the reason for re-forming in 1985: The single, "Rat Trap" was released the same year and received considerable radio play. The band released their first single for Columbia Records in 1985, a remake of the version originally released on the previous album. Recorded at Westside Studios, the song was written and produced by

Hall and Golding. "Rat Trap" was a success on the charts, even though the song was not as successful as their last single, which was a cover of the Joeski Love classic, "Too Much Monkey Business". The Specials also made their first appearance at the Reading Festival, before taking to the road that summer with a tour that supported Madness. The tour was a success, and a number of other shows were added, including dates with The Special AKA. Content and recording

Recorded at Westside Studios in London, the album shares similar themes to the band's earlier material, such as the themes of poverty and unemployment. While the themes are still prevalent, this album contains a range of more polished and professional sounding songs, b7e8fdf5c8
