Cells in the lumen of the anterior midgut of Rhodnius prolixus were studied by microscopic analysis and radioautographic analysis of their migration with the use of gold particle-labeled antigens. A significant percentage of midgut mast cells (25-32%) and lymphocytes (10-33%) are in direct physical contact with one another. It appears that the lymphocytes are migrating and homing in the midgut in response to antigenic stimulation. IgA-bearing cells and mast cells are chemotactic for R. prolixus lymphocytes. In contrast, the R. prolixus lymphocyte chemotactic factor was found to be antigen specific and also bound to the midgut mast cells and to the basolateral face of the midgut epithelium. These results indicate that antigenic stimulation of midgut lymphocytes is important in the pattern of migration and distribution of lymphocytes in the midgut and may be important for the determination of the primordial immune system of the triatomine bug.Q: Curve fitting algorithm My idea of curve fitting algorithm is: From certain data we calculate the "error function" We choose a number of starting points and calculate their curve approximations We calculate the "error function" for the curve approximation.
