Likely the title explains it all. I've noticed that when I run $ svn update on the remote repository hosted on Linux I get a substantial number of warning messages along the lines of "system signals interrupt, trying to kill process". It seems to happen regularly, a few times an hour. Other commands don't seem to trigger them (for instance, $ svn co URL or $ svn up). I am working in a project that currently sits on Mac (command-line Subversion) and Windows (MSYS2). I know that the Mac version runs into this same issue. How do I prevent this message? My current workflow for quick SVN refreshes involves running svn checkout on the remote repository to a local directory before I do anything else; I then edit, commit, svn add/rm/update as needed. I'm asking primarily for guidance for Linux, but I'm willing to spend time on the Mac version as well; I've limited experience with Mac so I don't know if there are any differences
